Nutrition Guide

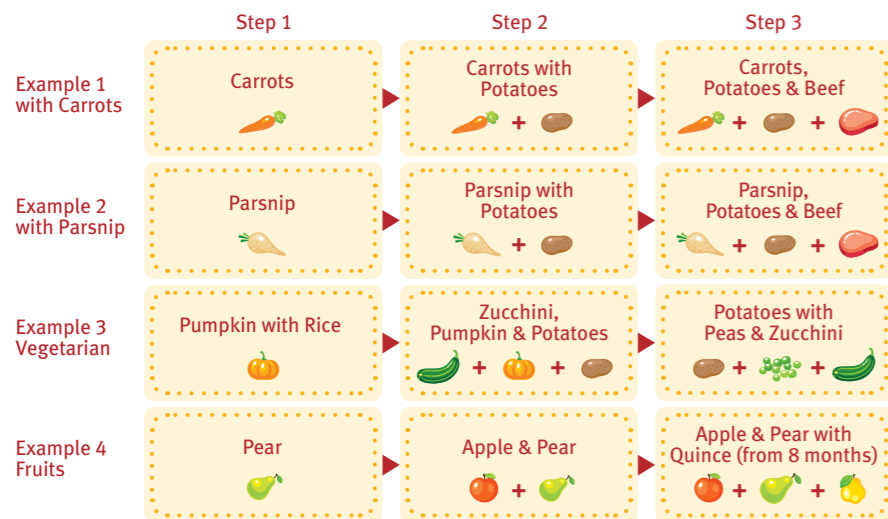

Introducing solid food with Holle baby jars

Introducing solid food

For most babies, after about 4 to 6 months mother's milk is not always enough. The first non-milk meal should be a vegetable purée given at lunchtime. When first introducing solids, you only need to feed a few spoonfuls of the purée before giving milk. Gradually increase the amount of solids until the whole milk meal has been replaced. Carrots, parsnip and pumpkin are mild and ideal vegetables for first purées. When introducing your baby to solids always err on the side of caution so as to readily identify possible intolerances or allergies. A good rule of thumb is to only introduce one new food per week and one new meal per month.

Introducing solids with Holle jars

Holle's jar range is based on the general recommendations for introducing babies to solid food. First solids should consist of just a single food so as not to stress your baby's developing digestive system. At first, single varieties such as carrots or parsnips are suitable. Next, your baby can try our small baby menu jars with potatoes and later on with another vegetable or meat. Below, you'll find examples of how you can gradually introduce more solid foods with Holle jars and so develop your baby's palate.

The new Holle jar range was developed to better help parents systematically support their baby's digestion. There are varieties to regulate your baby's stools and also softening varieties such as Apple & Plum. If particular ingredients have to be avoided, this can now be done more easily. We have a complete carrot as well as a parsnip range. Carrots have a rather stool firming effect. Should your baby need an alternative to carrot you can try parsnip. As an alternative to jars that contain rice, there are new vegetable meals with potatoes – they have a less stool firming effect. This way you can easily choose according to your baby's individual needs. In addition to well-tried varieties there is now an even broader selection. With green peas, quince or fruits of the forest every baby can experience a naturally flavoursome and varied diet. The chart overleaf gives a quick overview of the different effects of ingredients on a baby's stools. The new classification into 3 age brackets – “after 4 months”, “from 6 months”, “from 8 months” – makes it easier to choose food according to your baby's age.
